

Poetry South

2015

Poetry South

Issue 7 2015

Yazoo River Press

YRP

Yazoo River press
MVSU 5032
1400 Hwy 82 West
Itta Bena, MS 38941

Poetry South

Editor John Zheng

Art Editor Ben H

Managing Editor John Quinn

Contributing & Advisory Editors Angela Ball, University of Southern Mississippi Kendall Dunkelberg, Mississippi University for Women Carolyn Elkins, Tar River Poetry
Ted Haddin, University of Alabama at Birmingham

Poetry South is a national journal of poetry published annually by the Yazoo River Press. The views expressed herein, except for editorials, are those of the writers, not the editors or the Yazoo River Press. Poetry South considers submissions year round. Submissions received after the deadline of July 15 will be considered for the following year. Submissions and queries must be accompanied by a self-addressed, stamped envelope in order to guarantee a return or reply. No previously published material will be accepted. Poetry South is not responsible for unsolicited submissions and their loss.

Subscription rates are $10 for one year, $18 for two years; the foreign rate is $15 for one year, $30 for two years. All rights returned to authors after publication. We request Poetry South be credited with initial publication. Submissions, queries, and subscriptions should be addressed to The Editor, Poetry South, MVSU 5032, 14000 Highway 82 West, Itta Bena, MS 38941, USA.

ISSN 1947-4075

Copyright©2015 by Poetry South

Indexed by EBSCOHost/Literary Reference Center

Front cover photograph: Stained Glass Window of Chapel of Memories by BZ Huang Back cover photograph: Light through the Stained Glass Door of Chapel of Memories by BZ Huang

CONTENTS

- Dick Lourie* Jazz and Blues 5 Life on the Train 13
Pete Seeger's Axe 17
- Jianqing Zheng* Delta Connection: An Interview with Dick "The Poet" Lourie 20
- Kendall Dunkelberg* Ocean Springs 34 Undulant Fever 35
Asylum Roads 36
- Renee Emerson* For the Beauty of the Earth 38
- Theodore Haddin* Seeking Music 39
Grandpa Wears Neckties 40
- Patricia L. Hamilton* Aftermath 41
- Richard Jones* Seven Cantos from Italy 42
- Mark Parsons* Why Can't We All Give Birth to Our Parents? 48
- Susan Terris* The Kiss 50
Wing of the Future 51
Trespass: This Is Just to Say 51
- Erin Newton Wells* Dance 52
- Yuan Changming* [the betrayal of a tree] 53
- John J. Han* Korea: An Early Morning Dream 54
Squirrels 55
Little Girl and the Dracula Movie 56
- Xi Murong* The Sea's Question 57
A Tragedy: True and False 58
Parting in Life 59
Prayer 59

Spring Silkworm 60
Question 60
A Summer Afternoon 61
Choice 61
The River of Time 62
Mountain Moon (2) 62
Oyster and Pearl 63
Why 63
Turns in Life 63
Jasmine 64
Untitled 64
Concession 64
(Translated by Jianqing Zheng and Angela Ball)

Dick Lourie

JAZZ AND BLUES

Blues and Jazz meet at a sidewalk café for coffee or a beer they're old friends and—as old friends will—they stay in touch drift apart reconnect without pattern and when they manage to get their quite busy schedules together they'll find a place to hang out and just pick up where they left off: chatting and reminiscing—today for a start Jazz brings up 1920 and laughs “quite a shock remember? Crazy Blues the first ever blues record they called it—” Blues smiles and interrupts “of course and I know what you're going to say a huge blues hit but Mamie Smith's backup band is called the Jazz Hounds: folks couldn't even tell us apart: we were both in shock about that one and you said they must have needed that label 'jazz' to sell more records and I said just remember she's a blues singer” Jazz laughs “and I said: Blues my friend the real question is which came first—the Blues chicken or the Jazz egg” now they are laughing hard and Blues gives Jazz a high five (old as they are they do try to keep up with what the young folks are doing) “well some of these scholars” Blues emphasizes the word “thought they had the answer to that one it was just that you developed from me nature itself:

yeah I'm the chicken you dropped out of my hairy . . .” Blues laughs harder Jazz looks a bit embarrassed perhaps less tolerant of down-and-dirty humor than years ago when both of them would have indulged in this kind of rough joking—themes of sex (good and bad) whiskey despair Saturday night fish fries cops death the rent deceit joy trains jail lost love fine loving grief : Blues can still get down to it—if not with the same kind of defiance and bravado as before when they were after all younger—but Jazz has moved on or up depending how you see things more likely now to be giving a concert than playing for the rowdy crowd that still inspires Blues to feel that long gone youth or something like it if Jazz is wistful about that it doesn't show as the talk goes on “dancing” says Jazz “dancing is what I miss most about the nightclubs “and ballrooms those lindy hoppers the way they could step and fly and the drummers learned some very hip beats just from the tappers’ feet—” Jazz gets thoughtful Blues notices the silence “what is it my friend?” “well” says Jazz “it’s a trade-off isn’t it my rhythms got more complex the dancers don’t come out like they used to but the music is so rich I couldn’t give that up” “of course” says Blues “and look: who does come out? the grandchildren of those dancers they come to listen you have a real audience can’t do better than that” “huh” says Jazz “I think you mean the great-grandchildren” they both laugh “but” says Jazz you’ve still got all the dancers they show up at the joints don’t they love you?” “sure true enough” it’s Blues who gets thoughtful now “but you know I often feel like they think I’m some kind of rock and roll yes they love the guitars but they don’t really understand—I don’t have to tell you—how the space between the notes is what makes it music some of them anyway seem to want that ‘wall of sound’ and as the philosopher says ‘I ain’t no Phil Spector’ ” Jazz nods in agreement “not to criticize those friends of yours” says Blues “who can push right out there and do stuff nobody’s thought of before

I mean I admire the freedom the big tent I sure can’t put up with too much of that myself it’s just not . . .” “just not Blues” Jazz offers “exactly!” says Blues a slight pause “well the scholars do have a point” says Jazz generously “all my musicians keep saying that at the root of it all is you my friend: if my ten-dollar chords start to get cocky floating off here and there leaving that root behind if they forget your heart rhythm your I IV V if they go jazzing off into the stratosphere why they’re just playing tennis—as Robert Frost says—without a net and at that point to paraphrase you my friend ‘they ain’t no musician!’ yes without you I’d have no soul whereas without me like Hound Dog said: you’d just be on your merry way” touched by this tribute from a friend Blues smiles and says “sure on my merry way from one juke joint to the next right?” they’re laughing what’s true is that they are just about the same age grew up in the South Jazz more at home in the cities (where you could find some horns drums pianos) Blues mostly befriended by sharecroppers who needed those Saturday nights with guitars and harmonicas the dancing in the back rooms of shotgun shacks but eventually Blues too made some urban connections Ma Rainey Bessie Smith storming out of the tent shows tearing them up in the big towns Mamie with her cross-pollinating Jazz Hounds Blues and Jazz both traveled—in their youth a hundred years ago—and for that long they’ve been (to quote an old line) like “two trains running” sometimes—as in their Mamie Smith joke—seeming to cruise along parallel tracks so close that folks thought there was only one of them and sometimes heading full speed in opposite directions yet they’ve remained friends (unlike some of their more close-minded devotees: the condescendingly dismissive or those who claim to represent purity or—maybe the worst—all those faint praisers) and as old friends will Jazz and Blues share things they wouldn’t tell anyone else—“you know” says Jazz “that quote how one stretch of years can be the best of times and the worst of times”?

“sure” says Blues “Dickens Tale of Two Cities you must be thinking of that Renaissance in Harlem in the ’20s right?” “of course” says Jazz “of course” “yeah” says Blues “and I know what you mean: you and me both riding high getting called by each other’s name even jamming together the black musicians tearing it up rent parties nightclubs a whole scene literature painting it was something” “yes” says Jazz “and celebrating Africa especially the music—the rhythms and that’s us—as a huge gift to America so: best of times in a way—but also the worst” “you bet” says Blues “like the Cotton Club the whites would rush uptown to hear the Duke and look at the dancers doing their . . . their” now Blues is indignant “jungle plantation stuff those old nasty images then they’d taxi back downtown and tell their friends all about ‘this wonderful primitive African dance and such savage music and they all had that absolutely natural—’” “oh spare me” says Jazz “I hate that natural rhythm congo-bongo bull shit it did more damage—” “yes yes” says Blues “talk about African pride: at the Cotton Club and other places they tried hard to kill it with those shows that looked like live-action Tarzan movies” “not to mention” says Jazz “that the crowd being entertained by these colorful and—just by coincidence—barely dressed chorus girls (maximum age twenty-one) was always a white-people-only crowd” “you mean to tell me” says Blues feigning surprise “that all this was endorsed by our old friend the elegantly attired Mister James Crow Esquire?” “Ex-Act-Ly” says Jazz “and I remember how you and I talked at the time trying to figure a way out feeling trapped— our rhythms the heart of our music ‘the most glorious thing we got’ you said finally recognized and praised and at the same time under attack: not musically—which would have been fair even if narrow-minded—but vicious racist attacks on black musicians and all black people: twisting things around to fit that old happy singing darky image and you said something what was it” Blues thinks “oh yes I said it was like the same riff played in two different keys—the best and the worst” “well” says Jazz “that was then but now in these enlightened times we can be glad to have done away with solved transcended overcome ended put paid to and whipped the ass off all those problems with which history was once long ago replete” “Come on now” says Blues “you know I can’t do irony this early in the day” they’re smiling but this last shared recollection seems to have cast a shadow there’s a silence until Blues says “OK let’s see how sharp you are I brought the cards” Jazz laughs “I’ll take you on any time” it’s one of those private games mystifying to a stranger two friends trying to outsmart each other the deck perhaps a hundred cards one side blank on the other: a single large-print letter Blues shuffles lays the cards face down on the table “after you” Jazz turns over one card it’s an “L” each of them seems to be pondering “OK” says Jazz Blues turns the next one over “J” a pause: just a beat Jazz says “John Lewis”—a second before Blues shouts “Louis Jordan” people at nearby tables look up Jazz grins “let’s keep it down” Blues laughs “oh I thought if I was louder I’d be faster” (another of their old shared jokes) “never mind smartass” says Jazz “that’s a point for me next card please” Blues turns up a big “M” says “come on now” Jazz: “don’t rush me I’m thinking” slowly lifts the next card: “W” Blues jumps up hands clasped in prayer position whispers “Muddy Waters” Jazz (eyes closed in thought) “OK now . . . Mary Lou Williams” Blues hesitates “well all right we’ll call that a middle initial but you were slow on it anyway my point” “M” and “T” and now Jazz leaps up as if to pray “Thelonius Monk!” exactly as Blues pointing a finger says with a satisfied smile “Mama Thornton! If ‘Lou’ is a middle name then ‘Big’ must be a nickname” “hmm” says Jazz “half point each” “done” and the game goes on awhile “Katie Webster” “Wynton Kelly” “Cab Calloway” “Chick Corea” Jazz hesitates “OK now here’s Chick this reminds me of something I overheard—panel discussion at a music store one guy with a big mouth is holding forth about how white people just can’t play jazz yah yah on and on you know that bullshit” Blues nods “so what did you do?” “Well I was standing in the back next to a woman and she’s holding that 1953 Gerry Mulligan Chet Baker quartet album “yes!” says Blues “great stuff just those two with bass and drums” “right” says Jazz “it’s great stuff “so I whisper in her ear ‘why don’t you take your record and go give that asshole a dope smack on his head” Blues laughs “so did she?” “don’t know figured I just better get out of there” Blues laughs again “well not to make this a cutting contest” “no no not you” says Jazz “I know you’d never do that” “all right all right “ says Blues “well I was in Mississippi of all places and at a blues museum also one of those “expert” panels and here’s a guy who says—get this he’s not even talking about the ability to play he says white people should not play the blues as if we need some appropriate legislation to be sure they don’t try” Jazz is speechless a moment then “you’re right friend that’s beyond all what did you do?” well” says

Blues “I’m not going to claim that this was influenced by me in any way” “no of course not” “but what happened was just then a guy walks in and says in a loud voice “do you have any Charlie Musselwhite albums in your gift shop?” “a nice touch” says Jazz “and are there any cards left? I’m scheduled for a concert tonight” “just these last six cards and I’m due down at Red’s Lounge in Clarksdale” says Blues “so let’s play them and call it a day but just before we do I’ve been thinking wouldn’t it be inspiring to find a band that could dig our friendship—so hip so caring so understanding that they would have the best of you and the best of me in the same outfit grooving together . . . ” “ah come on” says Jazz “have you been doing your riverboat gambler impression again with that deck of cards?” “spare me your suspicions” says Blues your turn let’s do the thing” Jazz turns over an “L” Blues a “Y” “OK you old fox” says Jazz standing up in unison both laughing “Lester Young” they say “hats off to Prez” says

Blues now Jazz reaches out: “R” and Blues “J” “ah” says Blues and Jazz moans “Jimmy Rushing” two cards left Jazz smiles “you think I don’t know your tricks by now? Let’s do it together” each has a hand on the next card “B” and the next “C” they are still standing they bow “Count” says Blues “Basie” says Jazz at this instant down from blue sky a spotlight seems to shine on their faces from high up somewhere a voice: hip firm yet mellow joyous loud enough to be heard at every table in the place a voice that says “one more time”

“one more once” and the crowd goes wild

Dick Lourie

LIFE ON THE TRAIN

it's a long long way from Boston to New York not to mention Philadelphia but that's where my wife is—the love of my life or is that redundant (but then not everyone gets lucky) and I will help out this weekend: we're preparing to put her old family house on the market (they lived in it for more than fifty years) so I'm on this train—three hours to New York where we are arriving as I write: so sweeping and gorgeous out these windows a view I wish I could share with Walt Whitman who would have added this trip to his vast celebrations the ones where he got so excited he apostrophized himself “O take my hand Walt Whitman! Such gliding wonders! such sights and sounds!” and a vision: “I see the tracks of the railroads of the earth” Father Walt would have loved this ride—I can't recall if there was a train back then coming down from Boston but if there was of course the view would have been different not to mention the amenities my laptop battery will never run down on this train—just plug the machine into the convenient wall socket next to each seat and I won't go hungry here is the café car—OK just sandwiches and a few packaged snacks but the coffee is good and don't get me started on planes (or as the industry insists: the “aircraft” a subtle hint at the sense of care and personal attention that they hope to convey by the term “craft”) no I will take any time this six-hour session: sitting back relaxing I sip coffee and think about the whole history of train rides —mine and others— in this country it’s a glorious tale (as long as you were white) of club cars dining cars sleeping cars who would not want to be Jack Lemmon having a party with Marilyn Monroe in that upper bunk ah too bad—you didn’t get to see the outtakes? and now I think of the long long train ride with my mother when I was six New Jersey to Reno: 1944 divorce was tough to get in most states—much easier just to establish residence in Nevada (which took less than two months) where Reno was the divorce capital of the nation we rode that train we slept in it we dined on white tablecloths she entertained me with books and puzzles I watched the mountains roll by and I believe she sang to me so it was I had her all to myself no grandparents cousins uncles or aunts she didn’t go to work every morning: no distractions as there would be even in Reno where the soon-to-be divorced dallied for weeks amusing themselves and dating while they gradually became legal residents then the train ride back across the country not long after that she remarried I must have wished we were still on that train anyway I’m here now: dark tunnel Penn Station then New Jersey brown grass of the marshes New York across the river Philadelphia ahead my mother is gone so on this train ride

I have only myself all to myself which frequently leads to memory and reflection I won't see her again or Abby's father and soon the house itself will be gone it seemed like a long long way up that narrow slate walk to the front door first date I was hopeful—though not enough to expect this marriage: thirty-five years of “good good lovin'” (as James Brown used to say) now the big romantic finish—where it wraps up with my wife her father my mother symbol metaphor the old house the train but here's the problem: I started writing this on the ride home to Boston after my Philadelphia weekend just one day before that derailment same track same route home just a day too early or were they a day too late the dead and injured because I got the relaxed ride again sandwich coffee pastry—and all they got was that wreck—so now I surely can't use this poem as I intended: quiet reflection on me and my mother my marriage my wife's father Abe who lived and died in that house and took me in like a son all of it framed by the long long train ride—instead it's got to be Wordsworth turned on his head: “tranquility recollected in emotion” and thus it becomes at last about mortality but whose? (since my mother is dead Abby's father is dead) oh: it's mine me who was spared the train wreck just by luck I get to have more time—for no apparent reason—to be alive it's the proverbial “blind chance” seen one train ride you seen them all till one kills you or you escape from them all into old age as my mother and Abe Freedman did—both of them living into their nineties: after my stepfather's death I had my mother back undistracted for twenty years the poem I read at her grave was from a dream where I was in a race with a six-year-old—myself—to see who could get to her house first at Abe's funeral Abby's brother Peter and I guitar and sax played "September Song" one of Abe's favorites—in the Broadway show where it first appeared it's an old man's attempt at wooing a young woman but you know how words are: no matter what the intention once they are set out on the page they'll get sung in ways you can't control life of their own unpredictable as trains I think what appealed to Abe was the sense that your fate is like a year you know has to end—though you can't tell when ("it's a long long while from May to December") and you sense strict invisible limits ("the days grow short when you reach September") but within them you make your choices and there we are so "these few precious days I'll spend with you these precious days I'll spend with you"

Dick Lourie

PETE SEEGER'S AXE

I

Pete Seeger was 89 then 90 I imagined how losing him would feel maybe I would phone my friend Howie—we shared a house years ago when we were young and Pete was only in his mid-fifties—because besides the long friendship Howie as a graduate of the Washington Square School of Music (with a major in banjo mandolin guitar) is a friend who I thought would be feeling the same pain: today I made the call but he was not there I did manage to leave a message

II

then my old roommate Spencer phoned just “to commiserate” didn’t need to say why: did I remember hitchhiking to see Pete’s concert in Philadelphia we must have been said Spencer the only two students at Princeton who had even heard the name Pete Seeger 1958 Princeton I considered yes I think so after the blacklist Pete on his own the Weavers driven out of clubs concert halls ironically it was the Committee that turned out to be unAmerican

III

IV

I heard an interview with Pete: he says the Newport Folk Festival axe story is apocryphal: what really happened when Dylan switched to electric guitar was this: the sound mix is so distorted that Pete runs over to the tech guy “fix the sound, so we can understand the words” and the guy shouts “No! This is the way they want it!” but for Pete as always the words had to be clear “I was so mad” Pete says “I said damn it if I had an axe I would cut the cable” you had to know what was being sung the words hold the power that the music releases and Pete says his “main complaint” about many singers is that the music is so loud “I can hardly understand the words” if I had an axe if I had a hammer a bell a song not hard to understand these words of Pete and Lee Hays 1949

V

Pete Seeger’s “axe” in musicians’ parlance was his banjo not much use in slashing speaker cables but effective if you’re chopping away at other kinds of power

VI

Bob’s axe hacked his own path from politics to rock and roll Bruce’s cleared the way to drag rock and roll back into politics—one of them recorded The Seeger Sessions

VII

in that interview Pete told this story: Woody Guthrie performing with Sonny Terry and Brownie McGee a dinner somewhere during the war early ’40s after the show the head guy tells Woody there’s a table here where he can eat and that they've got a nice place in the kitchen where his friends can eat whereupon Woody shouts "what?! the fight against fascism starts here" and begins turning over tables crochery and all they try to hustle him out Sonny says "Woody Brownie's lame I'm blind come on we'll all get in trouble" Woody yells "the fight against fascism starts here" Pete says Woody taught him how to hop a freight no place now to hear these tales

VIII

the long list of regrets: I never met Pete Seeger though it would have been easy I never even wrote him a letter I could go on but I think I'll stop there

IX

here's the rest of the scenario that I imagined before his death: on the phone with Howie I'm in tears I suggest that we go to the funeral or some big memorial wherever it is just so we can be there to honor him and as one does to seek some sense of the absent loved one's presence—or is this it

X

Pete's axe clears the underbrush clears the air to make the words absolutely clear Pete's axe hums through the air it sings out the song about love between his brothers and his sisters Pete's axe rings out freedom Pete's axe hammers out danger hammers out a warning hammers out justice all over this land

Jianqing Zheng

DELTA CONNECTION:
AN INTERVIEW WITH DICK “THE POET” LOURIE

Dick Lourie is a poet as well as a blues saxophone player. In 1997, the chance to perform at a festival with the internationally renowned blues musician Big Jack Johnson led him to Clarksdale, Mississippi, Johnson’s hometown and a historically vital center of the Delta blues. Since then, he has returned to the town almost every year, attracted by the music, culture and history of the Mississippi Delta. In 2005, I met Dick in Jonesboro, Arkansas. Later he came to our campus to perform his poetry through playing saxophone. In 2009, Arkansas Review invited me to write a book review of his poetry collection If the Delta Was the Sea. I knew he had been enthusiastic about this poetry project for some years, doing research and reading books about the Mississippi Delta, visiting historical sites in the area, and interviewing people in Clarksdale. He has published eight books, The Dream Telephone, Stumbling, Lies, Letter to Answer, 4-Telling, Anima, Ghost Radio (with companion CD), and If the Delta Was the Sea (with companion CD) and edited, with his Hanging Loose colleagues Mark Pawlak and Robert Hershon, four anthologies of high school writing from Hanging Loose Press, and was one of the press’s founders in 1966.

—JZ

Jianqing Zheng: Dick, I remember when we met in 2005 at the Delta Blues Symposium at Arkansas State University, I noticed you wore a sleeveless black leather jacket with the word “poet” in red sewn on the back of it. It seemed like a silent announcement to the public that “I’m a poet.” I also noticed that at other occasions you wore a jean jacket that carries the “poet” too. Is there a story behind this?

Dick Lourie: Your memory is excellent, Jianqing, and accurate. I very frequently wear a black leather “biker” vest, with “POET” on the back in pink letters. Origin: My sister Mary, very handy with such crafts, many years ago embroidered “POET” in black on the back of my faded short pink corduroy jacket (we used to call them Eisenhower jackets, an echo of World War II). I thought, What a great idea! History: When I was in high school (mid-1950s), our colors of choice were pink and black. Maybe pink shirt and black pants, or black shirt with pink tie. That was fashion! I think I was nostalgic for that old mix of colors. Eventually, like all of us, that pink jacket wore out. I replaced it with a succession of black vests and pink lettering. Analysis: That new idea was partly a result of my post-modern notion of ironic appropriation: I wanted the pink lettering for POET (in some circles already suspect as not really a manly profession) to assert a refusal to be stereotyped as effeminate (“you can’t wear that—pink isn’t for men,”) by appearing defiantly embroidered onto that stereotype of machismo, the black leather biker vest. My only problem has been that my wife won’t let me wear it to bed.

JZ: In November of the same year we met again in Boston. You came over to pick me up at the hotel and showed me around, and I visited your wife and house in Somerville. What’s the reason that Somerville is called the Paris of New England?

DL: Somerville, a city of about 70,000 people neighboring Cambridge and ten minutes from Boston, is a city with a long history (not as long as Paris, to be sure); it started as a retreat from the big city next door where prosperous merchants built houses. Like Paris, Somerville eventually became home to a great diversity of people and cultures. After the first wave of prominent landowners came the nineteenth-century influxes of Italian and Irish immigrants. Today the city (again like Paris) is a mix of cultures and ethnicities—southeast Asia, Haiti, Brazil have all contributed to our rich diversity; there’s always been an African American presence here; and, starting about the time when my wife Abby and I moved to town, younger “urban professionals” began coming to town—but, importantly, and unlike in some other cities—the “old Somerville” didn’t melt away as those residents moved out. Our next-door neighbor’s family, for example, came here from Nova Scotia maybe sixty or seventy years ago. The population has increased mightily since we came here, and today old and new Somerville exist together in a lively and diverse city. Just recently Somerville has been referred to as “the new Brooklyn.” We are all trying to take that in and deal with our new identity as “hipsters.”

JZ: On the back balcony of your house, you talked joyfully about the history of Hanging Loose, bringing out an envelope that contained loose sheets of paper, which in fact were the poems of an early issue of Hanging Loose. The printing of the poems on loose sheets was atypical and original. How many issues were hanging loose like that? And what kind of responses did the magazine receive?

DL: Emmett Jarrett and I were students together in a seminar led by Denise Levertov (actually it was the first class she had ever taught) when he told me he and Ron Schreiber were about to kill off, after three issues, their literary magazine—too expensive—and resurrect it in a different format. Their elegant journal was called Things, after William Carlos Williams’s dictum, “No ideas but in things.” Emmett and I (after long-distance consultation with Ron, who was in Amsterdam that year) decided on loose pages; Gordon Bishop, a young classmate of ours, coined the name Hanging Loose in honor of our informal, more casual format.

The first issues were mimeographed—typed on stencils, printed on the loose pages. Then we recruited some young volunteers—(my sister Mary still has fond [?] memories of this—to join us as we walked around and around one long table, collating sixty or so pages by hand.

Response was positive—here was a magazine you could edit yourself, trashing the poems you hated and maybe tacking others up on the wall to admire. It was an unusual idea, and people liked it.

JZ: When did the magazine switch to the stapled or bound copy?

DL: The bookstore people didn’t like it—after a while it became obvious that if you could buy the magazine, take it home and “self-edit” by deleting the poems you disliked, you could do the same thing in reverse while you were in the store—remove the ones you liked and take them home without even buying the magazine. After 25 issues, we saw that the better part of wisdom would be to maintain the commitment to our particular esthetic (which remained indebted to Williams) while becoming a bit less literally “loose.” Today we have a perfect-bound magazine with full-color cover design and art portfolio in each issue—but still, as we approach issue #106 and head for our fiftieth year in 2016, we remain true to that commitment.

JZ: I visited your band webpage. You founded Juke Joint 5, and you have been called Dick “The Poet” Lourie, which may suggest either you have leaned toward poetry or you have been known as a poet wearing that poet jacket. How were you being called like that?

DL: The nickname has come right along with the vest. And quite deliberately. Like many musicians, I wanted to have a stage name (in my band we also have “Miss G,” “Mean Johnny B,” and “Silverstone Steve”). I am always very conscious of my double life, so to speak, as poet and blues musician, and I’m proud of each profession, so the vest and the nickname are my I.D. on stage where I want to make audiences aware that I am a poet as well. Offstage, I wear the vest pretty much everywhere. Again, I want to be known as a poet; I’m proud of my profession. And of course lots of conversations get started when people see the vest. The fact is that I wear it more often than not.

JZ: Have you ever been called Dick “The Saxman” (or “The Bluesman”) Lourie? And how many bands have you ever founded?

DL: Let’s see: The Juke Joint 5 and the Blue Suede Boppers (an all-fifties rock and roll band with the same five members now as when it started 28 years ago); and a while ago the band called “Six of One,” which got old before its time and expired peacefully (that’s another story . . .). And as for nicknames, no. “The Poet” is it, the only one. Think about it: there are plenty of “Saxmen” and “Bluesmen” up on stage—so a nickname like that for me might be taken as arrogant, pompous, self-aggrandizing—but there’s probably only one “Poet,” so I want it to be known. That’s another instance where I’m showing my pride in what I do.

JZ: Does your performance with your band also energize your poetry writing?

DL: Playing music energizes me in my whole life, including my poems.

JZ: Where did you meet Big Jack Johnson and sit in his band in the mid-1990s?

DL: My wife and I were on vacation in 1995 at the New Jersey shore. I saw in the local paper that a blues band would be playing that night at a local club. Had I known at that time of Big Jack's international reputation, I might have been intimidated—another of those cases where ignorance is the best policy. When I saw Big Jack taking a break on the porch outside the club, I just introduced myself and asked if I could sit in. It's a cliché, but Jack really was “the soul of generosity”; he would always say yes to anyone who wanted to play (of course if you weren't up to his standards, you'd be off the stage quickly, but with Jack you always got a chance). I sat in that night, and also the following week when they were in the Boston area, and after that I just caught up with Jack and the band whenever I could. At one point I counted up that I had played with him in thirteen states.

JZ: Are there any interesting memorable episodes about your performance with Big Jack Johnson?

DL: Unlike most other star performers Jack never stood at the center of the stage—he was always over at stage left. After a few years I realized why: From that vantage point, he could simply cast his glance over the whole band all at once. He'd always know exactly what each of us was doing. You'd be sure to get a subtle smile if you were really grooving—or else that “Look” that told you something was wrong, and that it was you.

One night in Providence, Rhode Island, Jack called for us to play “Tequila.” It was a number I hadn't played with Jack, but I did it regularly with another band, climaxing with one of the old historical sax player tricks: walking off the stage, through the crowd, and finally lying down on my back, still playing. I had to decide fast if I would dare to do this with Big Jack. I really didn't know how he would react. I took a deep breath (being a sax player, that was literal) and walked right off the stage into my act. Jack loved it and called the song almost every time we played. Sometimes before I lay down on the floor, I would kneel at his feet.

Then we played it one year in Clarksdale, during the finale for the Sunflower Blues Festival. This time when I walked offstage I was followed by my wife Abby and Jack's wife Angenette and several of their adult daughters and a few grandkids, all wearing big sombreros. That was quite a night.

JZ: Were you considered one of them, I mean a bluesman or a brother belonging to the band?

DL: It's one of my most cherished memories as a musician that Jack thought, and said, that my playing made an important contribution to the band and that he considered me a member of his band, whenever I could get to where they were playing.

JZ: You have been coming back to Clarksdale since 1997. How can the place be so magnetic to you?

DL: For me Clarksdale is a place, a culture—in fact, a number of cultures—on the one hand, very different from my own, and on the other hand, so welcoming to me that I feel when I'm there that I belong there, that I belong to a community (or a culture or sub-culture) of blues musicians. My first stop on arriving is probably Red's Lounge, where I'm greeted by old friend Red Paden. That's where Big Jack, who grew up with Red, always hung out; now Red and I have been friends for almost twenty years. I go by the Clarksdale Press Register office, where I've known photographer Troy Catchings almost that long. I will always have a breakfast at the Rest Haven restaurant with Andy Carr, a hero of mine, now in his late eighties: a third generation white cotton planter who sought to improve conditions for his workers and became a civil rights activist and member of the NAACP. I will have several occasions hanging out with Robert Birdsong, the Clarksdale native, blues historian, fire department captain, who knows everyone, and who was my "Virgil" as I sought out people for the interviews that would inform my poems and make my book about the Delta come alive. And at night when the blues music starts, I can go into three or four different venues and be invited to play—"Poet, come on up here and blow that sax!"

Must have lunch with Maie Smith, my old friend who works at the Delta Blues Museum, who will fill me in on local gossip.

Must stop in to see my other old friend, John Ruskey, musician, painter, builder of giant canoes in which he takes people out on the Mississippi River.

Bill Lockett—extraordinary citizen, attorney, club owner, blues supporter, and now mayor—is someone else I've known all these years. I always stop in to see him and chat about what's happening in town.

In other words, I am made to feel at home in what is really a different world from mine. And because I got interested in the place and its people early in my years of visiting, Clarksdale became a rich creative source for my poetry.

And here's a confession—one more reason from which I derive great satisfaction, though I'm not proud of it. I'm a Northeast guy—New Jersey, New York, Massachusetts—with very little experience of anywhere in the South, let alone the Delta, before I met Big Jack. I continue to regard Clarksdale just the way it's advertised, as the “home of the Delta blues.” I can tell anyone who's interested that I'm in Clarksdale for about two weeks every year. And sometimes, when I'm playing around home Boston with some really excellent blues musicians, just sometimes, I find myself thinking, “Well there my friend, you're a pretty good blues player. And your playing is, oh, I'd say, almost authentic, not bad. But tell me, how much time have you spent in Clarksdale?”

Now, Jianqing, I don't really ever say that to anyone; I just think that way when I'm feeling arrogant, boastful and superior. So let's just keep that between you and me.

And finally: we all miss Jack, and since his death, Abby and I have remained close to Angenette; we see her a lot when we're in town, and on Sunday we go to church with her and her mother Mildred, where I get to play, I actually go up and stand next to the choir, I get to play my sax in church. Then we go out to dinner with Angenette and Mildred. Nothing beats those Sundays.

JZ: Where do you usually stay in Clarksdale? The Riverside Hotel?

DL: I've stopped in and visited the Riverside of course—I like the atmosphere, where people hang out with each other, casual, comfortable. But when I'm in town, a week at a time, out late at night, expending energy on both music and writing—I need a more solitary place. I stay at one of the local motels where I can incorporate naps and quiet time into the rest of my activities.

JZ: The Riverside Hotel was originally the G. T. Thomas Afro-American Hospital, the scene of the blues singer Bessie Smith's death in 1937, following an automobile accident on Highway 61, which is now called the blues highway. The hospital was converted to the hotel in 1944. It began to house touring blues musicians, including Sonny Boy Williamson. What's your impression of the blues heritage the hotel has maintained?

DL: I can see that they've done a tremendous job of keeping memories alive. That is so very necessary.

JZ: Did you ever hear an interesting story about a bluesman connected to the hotel?

DL: I have to say no—I'm sure there are some great Clarksdale stories I have missed, and I hope others can tell them.

JZ: Now let's talk about your performance and poetry writing. You have two voices: your poetry and your saxophone. With which one you started first? Do they like twins demand your equal attention?

DL: Sometimes I tell people that I started out in poetry, but then realized I would never be able to make a living at it, so I became a blues musician. That is usually followed by a puzzled silence, and I have to say, "a joke! it's a joke!" In fact I've been a poet quite a bit longer than a blues musician. While I was getting started as a poet, I was doing music—as a semi-professional level jazz trumpet player and folk guitar strummer in my twenties and thirties—but it wasn't till my mid-forties (30 years ago) that I became interested in the blues, started on sax, and realized that blues was my true musical passion. And yes, poetry and blues do demand equal attention. It's a dilemma I'll never fully resolve, but I keep working on it. Having the CDs where I'm both reading the poems and playing the sax gets me there sometimes.

And by the way, Jianqing, as you know, I've had my "If the Delta Was the Sea" CD in my hands for a few years now, but it's just recently been officially released by Hanging Loose. Of course that is big excitement for me.

JZ: Your poem, "blues from Clarksdale," in Ghost Radio published in 1998 was written for Big Jack Johnson and his band The Oilers. Did you ever share the poem with him and his band? How did they respond to it?

DL: Guys in the band—some responded to poetry, some didn't. They all appreciated that I was giving them attention and respect. But Jack, as a true artist (though in a different area), knew the importance of the fact that I as a poet was shaping my work, my hard-earned creation, to honor him. He was very pleased and very moved.

JZ: The last stanza in this poem about Johnson is really strong:

and when he starts to sing you wonder how many hundreds of years he's been traveling

How did you get these two lines? What did you see or hear in his voice that influenced your writing?

DL: Jack brought with him, as a gift to us all, the history and tradition—still very much alive in his guitar and his voice—of African American life and struggles in the Delta as they had transpired over many years. He grew up on a farm; he labored at various jobs all the while honing his musical—I'll call it genius. In Jack's voice I heard the voice of someone who carried with him all those years of history. It was a short leap from Jack's actual voice to the metaphor of those lines.

JZ: In the inside cover of your CD "If the Delta Was the Sea," you say that your two passions, poetry and the blues, pull you in opposite directions. Was there a time you would think that there is a meeting point of the two or they complement each other or music helps poetry more than poetry does?

DL: This situation is what's sometimes called a "virtuous circle." Writing poetry about the music and its history helps to keep me focused on the blues and its significance, and to be aware of that when I get on stage to play the music. Playing the music, I always know that I'm a practitioner as well as an observer; that understanding informs my poetry and, I think, gives it energy. And as I mentioned earlier, the CDs, fusing both passions, help me get them pulling in the same direction at least some of the time.

JZ: Though you say your two passions pull you in opposite ways, I agree with Theodore Haddin who writes in his review of Ghost Radio that you are "one of the rare writers to have experienced enough musical life that [your] poetry is truly affected by [your] saxophone playing, and by all the camaraderie with band members and friends who love [your] brand of rock and roll." Can you use a poem of yours to talk specifically about the interrelatedness of your music and poetry and the influence of music?

DL: A little later, talking about syllabics, I'll go into the formal aspect of this question of how the music and the poetry interact.

Looking here at content, I think the best example is the title poem of the book and CD, “If the Delta Was the Sea.” A number of the poems of course illustrate how being on stage with friends in Clarksdale is an experience that has informed my writing—as Haddin wrote, quite accurately, I am privileged to be able to write about the blues as a practitioner. Here’s the poem:

If the Delta Was the Sea

Yes! Thank God; human feeling is like the mighty rivers that bless the earth; it does not wait for beauty—it flows with resistless force, and brings beauty with it.

—George Eliot, Adam Bede

“if the river was whiskey” Big T sings one night at Red’s juke joint “and I was a diving duck” a good old favorite from both black and white country traditions “I’d dive to the bottom and never come up” I’m standing next to T playing the sax and—blues being my meditative state—I think to myself: extraordinary metaphor! to be conditional and transformative at the same time and as usual when at Red’s I also feel immersed in Clarksdale so my mind shifts and spins the image till it comes to rest on the mysteries around me: if the river was Clarksdale what would I be? (stranger from such a different place poking around outsider trying to peer inside) would I be Twain on the Mississippi godlike pilot sure hand every rock and shoal clear in his mind? or Rimbaud’s drunken boat floating unguided toward those phantasmic ocean visions? and knowing that each choice bears its own gifts and dangers should I dive or sink or drift? and if the river was Clarksdale the Delta would be the sea (as indeed it once was) vast and in many stories primal “darkness upon the face of the deep” while the earth is still “without form” and if the Delta was the sea then Clarksdale every town roads houses forests fields even Red’s all would be mingled with it as waters of the Mississippi flow to the Gulf and we looking out over the Delta Sea from our narrow lives would think it endless and always changeable: in the era when cotton is king it’s a gleaming sea white in the sun or sometimes we look beneath: layers waves of black and brown topsoil rich deepest in the world we’re told calm and smooth or on some days the surface rough with old

Indian mounds or anonymous clumps of earth where slaves are buried and other days maybe close to twilight the Delta Sea is golden trick of the light or a reflection of great wealth and in the depths beyond our vision the registry of bones: the dead those newly wept for and down ever deeper thousands of years back to the Bronze Age—famously democratic this undersea city of bones unhinged from age race history cause of death and by now the “sea-change into something rich and strange” has as promised transfigured them all to coral and pearl and as my meditations come to rest back where I started at Red’s listening to T—if the river was Clarksdale and the Delta was the sea then tonight it would all be intense blue deep blue Delta Sea eternal the purest though darkest blue of blues I might never come up

Specifically now, with this poem, the occasion itself—onstage at Red’s—provides the entry point into the poem. And the blues lines being sung create the associative process that leads through the poem (“If the river was whiskey and I was a diving duck / I’d dive to the bottom and never come up”). The river metaphor in those lines brings me to Clarksdale seen as the river flowing to the Delta as the sea; and then as myself the outsider onstage with my sax, the river and the sea bring me to places I’m familiar with exploring, so to speak, as a poet: prehistoric ocean/Mark Twain/Rimbaud/buried bones/Bronze Age/Genesis/Shakespeare. Finally the “through line” returns me to being on stage and to reflecting on my relationship to Clarksdale and the blues—still within the “Delta as sea” metaphor, where now it’s me as the person diving. And the sea, though it may be, as metaphor for the music, the “purest blue,” is also, as metaphor for the Delta and its history of slavery and oppression, the “darkest blue.”

Thus the whole composition is an interweaving of blues and poetry, in a vital way—the poem depends on the blues for its very existence as a poem.

JZ: Your blues performance and poetry reading on Aaron Henry at Mississippi Valley State University in 2006 impressed me that your poetry was vernacular. Listening recently to your playing and reading from your two CDs, which keep the titles of your poetry collections, extends that impression. How do you think about your poetry?

DL: Like many poets who write in styles similar to mine, I seek to write poems that sound conversational; that is, I use informal diction—the attempt is to create the illusion that someone is speaking to you, casually yet with clarity and precision. The reason why this is an illusion is evident from reading most transcriptions of conversational speech, which are replete with repetition, redundancy, hesitation, and explanations of what was not clear when it was said a few seconds ago. The poet’s craft lies in creating an illusion of casual speech that is more articulate than the real thing.

Why is this kind of poetry not just prose broken into lines? Robert Frost famously held that writing poetry without rhyme is like playing tennis without a net. Brilliant, and partly true. What he missed is that besides rhyme, or meter, there are other ways of setting up your net. From Whitman through Pound, Williams, Levertov, and other of my particular poetic forebears, poems have been organized according to breath, or Williams' emphasis on American speech patterns and the "variable foot," or Denise Levertov's sense of "organic verse," and others. My own "net" is my use of syllabics: I write in unrhymed, unmetred lines of ten syllables each. For some reason I'm not aware of, writing in syllabics seems to lead me into a complicated syntax with long sentences, many clauses, almost like Victorian prose—although of course my diction, my language, remains un-Victorianly conversational, informal. So my style is characterized by the tension between simple diction and complex syntax. And since all my lines are of roughly equivalent length (though never rhythmically the same), I realized at some point that with a blues band behind me I could read my poems so that each line would correspond to a measure. Backed by a 12-bar blues I might, for example, during one 12-bar verse, read twelve lines—or I could read four or eight or ten lines with pauses for the music to comment. In other words, the syllabic nature of the poem allows me to actually score the reading against the blues band backup.

JZ: In If the Delta Was the Sea, you seemed to have intentionally created spaces between words or phrases in lines to make the meaning clear since you avoided punctuations. Does the space function also as a medial caesura of the vernacular poem or a rhythmic pause of the sound in reading?

DL: The space functions both as caesura and as rhythmic pause. When one reads the poem aloud, a space serves the same purpose as the rest in a bar of music; and on the page it substitutes for a comma, semicolon, or period. My reasons—one, visual: idiosyncratically, I don't like the look of the comma, semicolon or period; they interrupt the line. And two: other punctuation marks are very important to me, extremely useful in indicating distinctions of emphasis and modification within my "neo-Victorian" periodic style: these are the dash and the colon (not to mention parentheses [joke]) and those are the ones I want to focus on, without the distraction of the others.

JZ: In the coda of "So Italian" in If the Delta Was the Sea, you express:

Kendall Dunkelberg

OCEAN SPRINGS

A wall is not a wall if it contains a tree if it is covered in trees, their branches arching over every image, an intricate interconnected border with their roots always reaching lower to groundwater.

A wall is not a wall when the blue black panther of night prowls beside the window, when the sun and the rose glow in its corners, and the alligator day crawls on slow steady legs.
A wall is not a wall when it comes to life.

On these walls, the artist performs his social role, brings the community his gift, recounts the tale of the tribe, their history their labors, the hunt through the forest for the chesty deer, their slaughter, their sacrifice and thanksgiving.

These walls celebrate the harvest of the sea by both the native and the modern peoples with the same rhythms, the same arc of net the same washing and cooking round the hearth, the same intertwining of nature and culture.

These walls are not walls once they open onto the world to merge the artist's vision with the landscape outside, blending past, present, and the promise of a future, where walls will be windows into the soul and onto the world.

Kendall Dunkelberg directs the Low-Residency MFA in Creative Writing at Mississippi University for Women, where he also directs the Eudora Welty Writers' Symposium. The poems in this issue are inspired by the life and art of Walter Inglis Anderson and will appear in his third collection, Barrier Island Suite, forthcoming in 2016 from Texas Review Press. His previous books include Time Capsules and Landscapes and Architectures.

Kendall Dunkelberg

UNDULANT FEVER

Weeks after the trek through the bayou hunting wild iris, the fever comes on the slow legs of the sea turtle with the dank odor of sludge from a submerged sandbar, cold sweats, winter nights when spring should turn to summer.

The seasons are all a jumble, ice gives way to the fires of the summer, bronzed skin or a fever blush with chills.
Lethargy vacillates into a manic dance, Mississippi kites flashing their tails in a warm, stiff breeze.

Diving into the bay, Walter becomes a crab, waving a claw to the bulrushes on shore, scuttling along with bottom feeders, swimming for miles to be retrieved, nearly catatonic from the cold.

The fire in the sun or wild iris in bloom, scattered by a storm, washed away to be discovered years later, iris bulbs and turtle eggs buried in the same clumps of dune grass that shelter the nests of shore birds.

No such rest for Walter, caught in the throes of this fire, one moment burning with life and passion, then next cold, impotent, longing to drown in the waves or leap from a bridge, to swim, to fly, to die.

Kendall Dunkelberg

ASYLUM ROADS

The road to the asylum is cold and hard, paved with rigid stones and broken glass, smothered in deep vegetable silences, punctuated with inarticulate snarls, bared fangs, and sharpened claws.

In Baltimore, Phipps Clinic's four walls cage in freedom. Doctors pry open silences with ice baths and chemical shock, hydrotherapy and Metrasol, but the four edges of his sketch pad open onto another world.

The road home is long and silent.
Once there he becomes a wanderer in the wilderness of night, the paint in his brushes no longer flows, and his pad remains deaf and dumb.

The road to the bedroom rolls past thistles, through swamps and over beds of coals to the room of someone's child, but whose?
Cold hands at the throat, cold steel glare.

The road to Shepard Pratt is swift as the axe flashing threats in the rearview mirror.
The road ahead offers unfamiliar doctors, medications, and a library of voyages that are never enough, so he upends a bookcase, traps his orderly and disappears down the winter road into a snowstorm, walking for months on bleeding feet, in a heavy coat he got from a general's black maid, sustained by food begged at the doors of the poorest of the poor.

Unbathed, wild and hairy, he returns in spring, hiding in the barn, pilfering from the pantry, until his sister digs him up from under blankets like a dried and bitter root. The only record of his travels, scribbled on paper sacks, stuffed in pockets like a torn up treasure map.

The night roads of home wind through a labyrinth of dream and desire, through swamp sludge and ash of forest fires, past fields of jealousy, back to the bedroom where he throws the baby out with the butcher knife.

The road to Whitfield is short and swift on willing wheels with the sedated patient slumped in back, as wife and doctor drive to four grim walls that still hem him in.
Walls he decorates with birds of flight, climbing sheets out the window to escape.

Yet the return road is slower, calmer, more tired, taken in numb months, living first with his mother in a Jackson apartment, facing checkups, recuperation, and a gradual revival of painting, as he prepares for home.

Only on the sea road is he free. The four edges of his sail blow to the four corners of his dream.
The island looms ahead, an asylum without walls, without doctors or diagnoses, a living sanctuary where the artist reunites with his world.

Renee Emerson

FOR THE BEAUTY OF THE EARTH

Skin pocked and dimpled, wading in.
The water another flawed surface.

The pelicans dive and catch, holding one life to another.
In the orchard, we didn't have to think.
Sunlight touched what was just out of reach.
We held up apples pink as baby tongues.
Marred with white, quarter-sized, bites.

Noting the difference, I teach my daughter that it is easy when we want it to be.

Renee Emerson is the author of Keeping Me Still (Winter Goose Publishing 2014). She earned her MFA in poetry from Boston University, where she was awarded the Academy of American Poets Prize in 2009. Her poetry has been published in Indiana Review, Southern Humanities Review, storySouth, 32 Poems, and elsewhere.

Theodore Haddin

SEEKING MUSIC
for Karim Shamsi-Basha

Out of the desert sands, born of the distant sun, comes a man, calling in the old way through the lands a song of sight and sound, pictures of his past in passing, streets and steeples of a new country come to, and people, people looking back through his lens, from India, Iran, Syria, Spain and France to his new America miles and miles from the desert sands.
Here, too, he comes seeking music in himself, with hardly a lesson to go by, but determined to understand his world, the world without violence, the change that must come over us as searching fingers find their notes upon the keys. In a new music all sins are forgiven.
The imam sings his Qur'an in all of us, the psalmist enjoins the mystery of God's melody in a man. The new music joins us together who are needing to learn how to sing. So this man, seeking his music, modifies the world and its senses, from so far back his calling comes to tell us where he has been, and who we are.

Theodore Haddin, a professor emeritus from The University of Alabama in Birmingham, is the author of two poetry books, The River and the Road and By a Doorway, In the Garden. He has published articles and reviews on American literature.

Theodore Haddin

GRANDPA WEARS NECKTIES

He stood his usual grinning self before the mirror with his new bowtie.
'I can do this easy,' he says, and begins to wrap two ends tight about his collar.
Then whatever slipped stuck in knot.
He looked at it and went right on as if to finish the job. But it twisted, it didn't turn, it caught his finger.
He was struggling with a snake.
He gritted his teeth.
At last he had to admit he couldn't do it. He hated what to do next.
He sought the scissors in the kitchen and held one end of the rascal till he could cut it all off, blue Blenheim it was, Churchill's favorite, shredded to the floor, as if old buildings had fallen in London. But he was so far from the London streets now he'd never go back. Then off for a necktie, black, and carefully wrapped it, pulled it back. He couldn't be seen doing this. With his foot he kicked at the scraps.

Patricia L. Hamilton

AFTERMATH

The silence after the storm ravages, numbing the senses. No birds sing.
Instinct unites them in reverence for the wreckage of limbs where they might have been nesting, now strewn about as carelessly as a child's pick-up sticks.
No dogs bark. They cower under beds, noses buried in their paws, still cringing at the thunder's treachery, disavowing the testimony of a clock's soft ticking.
Only a black-and-white cat picking its way through leafy debris as it crosses the wet pavement remains undeaftened by the tumult's end.

Patricia L. Hamilton's debut volume of poetry, The Distance to Nightfall, was published by Main Street Rag in 2014. Her work has recently appeared in Deep South Magazine, Third Wednesday, Innisfree Poetry Journal, Cider Press Review, and Red River Review.

Richard Jones

SEVEN CANTOS FROM ITALY

Resting my head against the train window, I remembered sitting at the table with tea, home in America, a book of paintings open between us, the house cloistered by a night of snow.
Laura had leaned close and I could feel her warmth when she told me we would see the frescoes.
She turned the pages and touched her finger to the book's illustration of an angel hovering over the Lord's wounded head and removing the crown of thorns and putting on the crown of paradise.
Beyond the window, I saw cypresses on hills pointing to heaven and farmhouses waking.
I closed my eyes and tried to sleep, but the train kept stopping to let people off, to let people on.
At one of the stops, when I was half dreaming, I sensed someone sit beside me.
I allowed one lid to open—awake with one eye, asleep with the other—and glimpsed the face of a man who worked in the sun, a man my age, bearded, heavy.
I closed my eye and moved back into the dream.
A few minutes later,
I heard the conductor ask for his ticket.

I tried to lull myself to sleep by thinking of my father—a walk we had taken when I was a boy of seven or eight.
We were walking in a park toward the swings, the Southern sun silvering the glossy leaves of sweet-smelling magnolias, and I could feel my hand in his—the strength of his grip.

And I remembered the last time I held his hand, when he was old and dying, how frail his hand in mine, his face shining as he lay on the sofa in the sunlight.
“Fumi?” a voice said.
Smoke? My father didn’t speak Italian.
I wondered who was talking.
The man in the purple seat next to me nudged me awake and said again, “Fumi?” I opened my eyes and looked and the man was holding out a pack of cigarettes, an offering.
“Grazie,” I said, taking a cigarette, not having smoked a cigarette in years.
This made him happy, even though we couldn’t smoke together until we got off the train, if we got off the train together.

I closed my eyes to go back to sleep, to get back to the dream and my father.
I felt an elbow again in my side.
I opened my eyes and looked up again.
“Sposa,” the bearded man beside me said, holding out his wallet in which there was a picture of his wife.
In his old billfold he carried pictures of his family, which he proceeded to show me, one by one.
“Mio figlio,” a picture of a twelve year old sitting on a donkey. “Mio padre,” a picture of an old man holding a shovel.
“Mia madre,” a woman in a black dress and shawl (I couldn’t tell whether it was a wedding or a funeral).
His brother was a clerk, “un impiegato.”

His eldest son, Angelo—il professore!
His daughter-in-law was Antonella, a lovely girl in her wedding dress on the steps of a church with the entire family—“Attilio, Marco, Gabriella, Antonio, Binto, Silagro, Capricia, Tiziana, Maria, Bonfilio, Isabella, Ronaldo, Fiorella, Miquel, Rafael, Anunciata, Pico, Alessandro, Violetta, Ravenna, Ugo, Valentino, Immacolata, Nerezza, Francesca, mio figlio, Angelo, il sposo, e finalmente la sposa, mia figlia-in-law—” and here he waved his hand in the air for joy—“Bella Antonella.”

When the man had finished, he closed his wallet and put his family away, patting his pocket as he did, an almost indiscernible puff of dust rising from his coat.

The man sat looking at me, waiting.
After a moment, to communicate to him that I found his family beautiful and to let him know that I appreciated his generosity for introducing them to me, I nodded my head, bella, grazie, but still he kept looking at me, though I did not know what he was waiting for.
I shifted in my purple seat.
I turned and looked out the window, squinting.
When I turned back he was still looking at me, still waiting.
“Tua famiglia?” he said.
“Ahhhh,” I said.
He wanted to see my family.
I thought of my paltry billfold.
I pulled out a picture of Laura and our children, Sarah, William, and Andrew, the four of them on the beach, wading in the waves, the sea and sky one, the sun on their ecstatic faces.
The man said something in Italian, something about photographs and the sadness of time.
He waited to see more, but I had no picture of my father, no picture of my mother, no photo of my sister and her husband, not even a photo of her son, her Andrew, the first person I dared to love, the child who drowned when he was five.

In the years before I met Laura, I remember riding night trains from Paris to Rome, Rome to Palermo, the train passing by towns so small they seemed no more real than wishes a man might make to be healed.

As my heavy-set friend dreamed and snored next to me, I looked out the window, a little sleepy and dreamy myself, and thought how the wish Laura made back in our kitchen will be fulfilled today. We'll stand together in the chapel and gaze at Pinturicchio's paintings and by that vision be renewed.

Now I realize this was always her plan.

And when the day ends, arm in arm like Italians we'll enjoy the passaggiata, that slow stroll through town at twilight, stopping at one stuzzichini bar after another, sitting at the tables, drinking wine and sharing little snacks. And later in the hotel room bed, how, I wondered, shall we sleep, being so happy?

We'll turn out the lamp and undress in the dark, a little shy with each other, though we'll leave the balcony doors open to the sound of laughter rising and the revving of the ubiquitous scooters with the young boy and girl holding tight as they race in the street below.

Such were my thoughts as the train sped north and the day brightened and the train slowed and stopped at a station at the foot of the mountains, at Spello.

The purple seat beside me was empty.
I must have fallen asleep and the bearded man with the billfold must have gotten off at some little town full of wishes.

I strapped on my bag and disembarked, nodding to Spello's blue-capped porters, disappointed to see me with only a rucksack.
Standing in the morning light in the tiny, unhurried station, perhaps the porters could see before them a man who carried only the lightness of victory, a man who rubbed his chest, his heart, as the station windows filled with sun, the air with the music of human voices.
I remembered Aloysius one day in the garden hanging the brothers' washed clothes to dry.
I was telling him I felt lost and wasted, that I was like parched ground.
Art had always been my guide through life, leading me through inward mazes, but the monk told me simply to go into my cell, and that my cell would tell me everything—that too much striving, too much introspection, takes you away from God and the world, and leaves a man waterless and wandering.
So like a wise and prudent monk, I stopped at a newsstand and bought a bottle of water and a city map to find my way through Spello.
The fleeting world before me now like the sweetest gift, I stepped from the station into the street outside, and said to myself, "To the fountain."

Spello. Picture the tiny walled town straddling the foot of Monte Subasio and the hills St. Francis called home.
Roman buildings and medieval churches crowd the narrow cobblestone streets.
The houses, red-tiled roofs, towers, and spires—all burnished to a pink hue by the Italian sun—shine golden and mellow at sunset.
Except for terracotta pots of rosemary and sage that line patios and walkways and stairways, and the geraniums and impatiens that hang from walls and arches, and the vines and ferns that cascade from windowsills, all is stone. In spring, during the Inforata festival of flowers, artists cover the pavement with paintings made of petals, the wild flowers of Umbria gathered from the surrounding hills.

Past the Duomo of Santa Maria Maggiore, accordion music spills from restaurants and boisterous singing and shouts remind one that life is lived here, lived well and cherished, families and friends eating and drinking together.
It's been that way forever.
Above the first-century Porta Consolare, statues of a man, woman, and child guard and protect the city, and I've read that the woman's strong and wise face resembles Petrarch's Laura.

Richard Jones is a poet. His books include Apropos of Nothing (Copper Canyon Press, 2006) and The Correct Spelling & Exact Meaning (Copper Canyon, 2010). His poems are published in such popular anthologies as Billy Collins's Poetry 180 and Garrison Keillor's Good Poems, and he has been heard on National Public Radio. His collected poems, The Blessing (Copper Canyon, 2000), won the Society of Midland Authors Award for poetry. For thirty-three years he has been editor of the literary journal Poetry East, which celebrates poetry, translation, and art from around the world. Currently he is Professor of English at DePaul University in Chicago.

Mark Parsons

WHY CAN'T WE ALL GIVE BIRTH TO OUR PARENTS?

I half-yell and half-sob at little people carved from stone and bound with rope and cloth and fur, diminutive archetypes holding empty boxes like someone's life depends on it, bee sting lips and button eyes on too-large heads.
Docented down the emergency stairs, we scuff through the lobby, where I glance at a woman who's built like the Venus of Willendorf sitting behind the receptionist's counter, and out the automatic sliding doors to stand beneath a canopy a blinding crescent shrouds like mist, consigning us to the parking lot and then home for another screening of Friday's pick, everything about the film a complete surprise until the end, when we stare dumbly and in disbelief at actors and actresses acting the part of the good citizens of Los Angeles rubbernecking a traffic accident of monstrous proportions, dressed like the actors and actresses acting as extras on the sets of different sitcoms, dramas, movies, and soaps, or the campy cast of Can't Stop The Music, the Village People and Jenner vehicle, gays and lesbians dressed in parodied straight attires:

a shuttle bus driver, a phone line repairman, a construction worker with a horseshoe moustache, a bartender straight out of the old west,

a nurse getting off work in the middle of the day.

Mark Parsons' poems have recently been published or are forthcoming in Curbside Splendor, Smalldoggies, Heavy Feather Review, Regarding Arts and Letters, Sierra Nevada Review, The Dr. T.J. Eckleburg Review, Soundings Review, Iodine Poetry Journal, subTerrain, Emerge, and elsewhere.

Susan Terris

THE KISS

Pintails on the lagoon flinch and dive when she angles the canoe but not the ravens, soot-colored gossips. Parts of herself are fogged, but too much is visible; and the ravens will cry out.
She paddles native-style recovering her blade below water a purl of diminishing pools—real and imagined. On a piling, a heron watches. He sees. He saw. He knows the kiss at the end of the pier was a lapse, false clew in a maze.
There are ragged explanations, not unlike a girl's daisy test of loves-me, love-me-not, petals pulled and sucked one by one into clockwise spirals of pain and pleasure.
Their mouths, their bodies. Yes, the kiss at the end of the pier was an involuntary twitch of lips.
She must stroke away.
Memory is only a maze with a whim of fog tracing its dark mirrors.

Susan Terris' most recent book is Ghost of Yesterday: New & Selected Poems (Marsh Hawk Press, 2013). She is the author of six books of poetry, fifteen chapbooks, and three artist's books. Journal publications include The Southern Review, Denver Quarterly, The Journal, North American Review, and Ploughshares. A poem of hers from Field appeared in Pushcart Prize XXXI. She's editor of Spillway Magazine. Her chapbook Memos has just been published by Omnidawn. A poem from this book, which first appeared in the Denver Quarterly—"Memo to the Former Child Prodigy"—was selected by Sherman Alexie to be published in Best American Poetry 2015. <http://www.susanterris.com>

Susan Terris

WING OF THE FUTURE

Today's unforgiving light scores the pond. In that glare, I stand alone. The Hunter's moon will soon set, gone like the veined dragonfly wings I tried to save—ephemera. Vein or vain. Hole or whole. Don't answer. Words can't cure this. The edges are dull. A fire won't change the chill. Don't think of summer at the lake or New Year's at the beach. $X+Y$ equals nothing I've ever understood. Show me how first light opens the sky, and I will not know what to do. It's so late now, the wing will never lift us up.

TRESPASS: THIS IS JUST TO SAY

I took your husband on a walk under wild plums in full bloom

a man you ignore and are probably keeping for his money clip

Forgive me but he is delicious so sweet and so hot

Erin Newton Wells

DANCE

You again. It's only you making a sloppy rhythm on the shore where the sand is immigrant. Who knows where it comes from? Every color of the world is here in particles. Waves scrape into the ribs of cliffs, the flanks of bays.

I want is what they say.
I want. And you always return, bringing no tune but the tune of the surf, its crash and roll, the hollow suck drawn back into its underworld.

Who knows how deep it goes or if it wanders?

Your footprints slur and will not hold a shape in the sand.
They slide into the dance but lose the steps.

You are made of these minerals.
Each time you come up from the sea, it wants you back.

Erin Newton Wells lives in Charlottesville, VA, where she is winding down a career of over thirty years of teaching studio art in an art school she established. She has been writing all her life and is now reentering this more actively and publicly. Her poetry, fiction, and non-fiction currently appear in regional anthologies and journals.

Yuan Changming

[the betrayal of a tree]

You long to be a Douglas fir Tall, straight, almost immortal But you stand like a Peking willow Prone to cankers, full of twisted twigs

Worse still, you are not so resistant As the authentic willow that can bend gracefully Shake off all its unwanted leaves in autumn When there is a wind blowing even from nowhere

No matter how much sunshine you receive During the summer, you have nothing but scars To show off against winter storms The scars that you can never shake off

Yuan Changming, an 8-time Pushcart nominee, grew up in rural China, started to learn English at 19 and published several monographs on translation before moving to Canada. Currently co-editing Poetry Pacific with Allen Qing Yuan in Vancouver, Yuan has poetry appearing in 1009 literary publications across 32 countries, including Best Canadian Poetry, BestNewPoemsOnline and Threepenny Review.

John J. Han

KOREA: AN EARLY MORNING DREAM (Etheree)

Tears fall down Mom's sunburnt face as I say goodbye to her. She looks thin like a dry twig, she holds a bamboo cane. I promise her I'll come back next year.
After our photo, I leave her.... Awake, I return to my Occidental world.

John J. Han is Professor of English and Creative Writing at Missouri Baptist University, where he also serves as editor of Cantos: A Literary and Arts Journal and chair of the Humanities Division. He has published his poems in numerous periodicals and anthologies worldwide, including Frogpond, Modern Haiku, and World Haiku Review.

John J. Han

SQUIRRELS

end of snow a squirrel flying toward a bird feeder

spring trail a squirrel jumps to the right one more to the left

*

endless war—a squirrel survives traffic, fights another squirrel snug in the shade a squirrel unaware of the air gun

*

autumn solitude a squirrel perched atop a tree

plenty of nuts two squirrels squabble regardless

*

rheumatic fever a squirrel's crawl slow slow slow winter wind a squirrel wraps its tail around itself

John J. Han

LITTLE GIRL AND THE DRACULA MOVIE

her older brother watches a vampire film she peeks from afar

the count's mouth opens she yells at the victim, "Wake up!"

seeing the vampire bite the neck of a pretty girl, she touches her own neck the vampire's victim turns pale she turns pale too

gusty winds outside she hears a flapping sound is it a bloodsucker?

she's shocked to see her dad's bloody hands... oh, it's just ketchup

Xi Murong

Sixteen poems translated from the Chinese by Jianqing Zheng and Angela Ball

THE SEA'S QUESTION

—My dear, let me look you up and down so I'll remember forever

What on earth is forever?
Waves glimmering under moonlight Or the cozy sea wind?
The wet sandy beach under our feet Or your face shy smiling Against wind?
(My dear, let me look you up and down so I'll remember forever.)

What on earth is forever?
The kiss I've expected for a thousand years Or the tenderness in our hug? The happiness That chokes and shudders Is waves roaring by our ears And surging over
To bury us deep.
*(My dear, let me look you up and down
so I'll remember forever.)*

Can't we just stay?
Can't we Make time stay too?
Can't we change into wild vines To hold to the boundless sandbank, This starless and moonless night, And all the tenderness we have?
*(My dear, let me look you up and down
so I'll remember forever.)*

But, what on earth is forever?
Fifty years later,
What will be unseparation?
What will be "remember forever"?

Fifty short years later, What will be vows?
What will be “seas may dry and rocks may crumble”?
In the starless and moonless night Finally there will be nothing But the boundless sandbank.

(My dear, let me look you up and down...)

A TRAGEDY: TRUE AND FALSE

I must not really be old—If I were, there would be no crash Of happiness when I saw you At this moment.

When you hesitate to look back,
It means you haven't forgotten.
If you had, how could your eyes shine With tenderness under the moonlight?

But it seems that you don't Really care. If you once did Think of me, how can you Shake hands with me calm as thin clouds And light wind, then smile a good-bye?
I gaze after you, walking away Once again.

Xi Murong, born in Sichuan of Mongol parentage, moved to Hong Kong in 1949 and to Taiwan in 1955. She is a well-known artist in Taiwan. In 1981 she created a sensation especially among the young readers with the love poems in her first poetry collection Qilixiang [Seven-Mile Scent]. Angela Ball teaches at the Center for Writers, University of Southern Mississippi, and Jianqing Zheng teaches at Mississippi Valley State University. Their translation has appeared in many magazines including Crab Creek Review, Denver Quarterly, Exchanges, Mid-American Review, Natural Bridge, Poet Lore, Poetry East, Renditions and The Literary Review.

PARTING IN LIFE

Please look,
Please look at me one more time.
In wind, in rain, Look back again to gaze at My face tonight.

Please keep this moment Firmly in mind because After, you and I will turn Onto strange roads.

It's saddest to part in life.
Some day
In an unforeseeable reunion, I will never Ever be
As beautiful as tonight.

PRAYER

I know this world isn't so good,
I know it has parting and aging, But I only have one chance, so God, please listen to my prayers.

Please give me a long, long summer, A flawless memory,
A tender heart,
A pure love.

I can only come to the world once; so Please also give me a pretty name He can use to murmur at night And, in flying years, Remember our love stories forever.

SPRING SILKWORM

Because I often meditate When you hatch
You'll have splendid wings

And eternal prospects, In my life I'm willing To be a lone spring silkworm In my golden cocoon And wait for the next-life's Promise.

QUESTION

I've spent my whole life Pondering a question.

When I was young as a bud I felt too shy to bring it up.

When the boughs were all in bloom We had already parted.

We meet again tonight,
But our gray hairs embarrass us.

It's funny—I'm so unlucky To have spent all my life Pondering this question.

A SUMMER AFTERNOON

Miss you and that Summer afternoon—
You walked slowly out of the deep woods Toward me, a smiling lotus just out of water,

Toward my gentlest
And most painful part,
My holy, remote, and Untouchable youth.

I wish to burn
All our pretty years in an instant Like the fate of Pompeii And form an eternal mold in tears So that time by time in thousands of years They can be again and again Inlaid in our hearts.

CHOICE

If I come to this world Simply to meet you once, Simply for all the joy and sorrow in an instant, In an instant in billions of light years,

Then let all that must take place Appear in a flash,
Let me bow to thank all the planets for their help, Let me meet you,
Leave you,
Complete a poem proposed by God,
And then slowly age away.

THE RIVER OF TIME

—Who says we must age and separate?

But, my dearest,
Don't you hear What flows quietly
Past our bed
And startles me?

Black hair on snow-white pillow, Your young, strong body Lies peacefully beside me.
Behind the window, you're my life company; Outside, a moon bright with sparse stars.

Oh, my dearest, at this moment Is the river of time flowing Past our bed
Or just my nightmares and dread In the dark?

MOUNTAIN MOON (2)

I once went there on moonlight Because you were in mountains.
Tonight, relating our past in tears, I seem to see your smiling face.

Mountains look dark,
My pretty years are gone.
I imagine when spring comes to the woods, A strong man, you Will still hold me by the arm To walk up the mountain steps.
But now, moonlight is like water,
And grass black and dim.

OYSTER AND PEARL

Unable to remove the scar, You wrap the past layer upon layer With warm tears.

Day by day memory shines In your chest with each turn Touching your tender spot And making you age sadly when you recall In the deep, silent bottom of the sea.

WHY

I can lock my pen,
Why can't I lock my love and grief?

In a long life Joy blooms so quickly,
The most beautiful time
The first to die away.

TURNS IN LIFE

In the scented season, In fallen flowers, isolation,
And your looking back,
I can only sing a toneless song In tears.

But in an instant,
In the rising curtain, Lights, and applause, I find My song is the opera's Unexpected brilliance.

JASMINE

Jasmine seems Seasonless—
Day and night
It blooms exquisite Fragrant buds.

Missing you seems No difference—
Day and night
In every lost thought.

UNTITLED

Love should be joining, Not parting.

If love is not joining,
Not saying,
And not remembering,
It's like sparks
That can't burn
Gazing alone
At the dark sky.

CONCESSION

If my eyes
Once staged your scented summer days And my heart Keeps an honest poem,

Then, it's not bad
To die unhappily.